The legislature hereby finds that occupational wellness programs and preventative health strategies directly address the leading causes of disability and premature death in the United States. Furthermore, the vital importance of this issue was recently crystallized by the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) who earmarked $14 million to study occupational wellness programs.

The legislature hereby finds that there is a significant state interest in encouraging a proactive approach to preventing illness and injury, as opposed to the traditional reactive, sick-care method. A reorientation of our systematic approach to health care is exemplified by United States Senate Bill 2558, the Healthy Lifestyles and Prevention (HeLP) Act and New York State Senate Bill 5774-A of 1999-2000, The Wellness and Preventative Health Care Program.

The legislature hereby finds that individual studies and evaluations of wellness programs have concluded that such endeavors have dual, reinforcing, and parallel benefits. In the first instance, employees have become more fit, reduced obesity, lessened stress levels, quit smoking, and achieved other propitious outcomes. Secondarily, wellness programs have increased overall productivity, economic viability, and reduced health care costs relative to employers.

The legislature hereby finds that encouragement of a healthy lifestyle, while accruing concrete benefits to employees and employers alike, in the final analysis -- empowers individuals, strengthens families, and promotes a greater quality of life.

The legislature intends to ensconce the ethic of a healthy workforce into the fabric of our personal and professional lives, while realizing the tertiary benefits of savings on insurance premiums as the result of reducing the number and instance of health insurance and workers' compensation claims filed by employees.
