697-b. Human services employee wage board.

§ 697. Statement of public policy. The legislature hereby finds and declares that there are persons employed by human services providers in the state of New York at wages insufficient to provide adequate mainte-10 nance for themselves and their families.

Human services workers are essential to the state and localities' 13 ability to assist new yorkers confronting a range of social challenges. 14 To achieve cost savings, government has transferred most legally mandated human services for New Yorkers to nonprofits and in turn have created massive pay disparities within the field. Government is not just the predominant funder of human services in New York, it is also the 18 main driver of human services salaries as it directly sets salary rates 19 on contracts or does so indirectly by establishing costs for a unit or 20 service, along with required staffing on a contract.

Nonprofits contracted to provide human services are not only provided 21 insufficient funding to pay their employees, but are met with chronic

23 delays in payment, underfunding, and a lack of sincere collaboration to create meaningful and lasting interventions. Between two thousand eight and two thousand eighteen, the state cut human services funding by twenty-six percent, with lower rates now than in nineteen hundred eighty. These contracting practices have created extreme pay disparities where human services workers make on average seventy-one percent of what government employees make, and eighty-two percent of what private sector workers receive.

The pay disparities in the human services sector also have important consequences for race and gender equity. The human services provider workforce of nearly eight hundred thousand people is overwhelmingly female (sixty-six percent), over two-thirds are full-time workers of color (sixty-eight percent), and nearly half (forty-six percent) are women of color. The majority (sixty-three percent) have a four year college degree or better; yet they make about twenty thousand dollars a year less than a public sector worker with a comparable education.

Government savings are being borne on the backs of low-income neighborhoods and black, indigenous, and people of color (BIPOC) communities who get reduced services and a workforce that is predominantly made up of women and people of color who are paid poverty-level wages. The relatively low pay in the core human services sector means that fifteen percent of all workers (both full- and part-time) qualified for food stamps in two thousand sixteen through two thousand eighteen.

A human services employee wage board is necessary to investigate the pay disparities between government employees and employees of contracted human services providers and develop recommendations on adequate and equitable wages.
