Section 1. Legislative findings and intent. New York State is at a very critical moment in its history. Many recent articles have cited information provided by the United States Census Bureau that shows over one million people have left the New York area since 2010, and this can be attributed to the high cost of living forced on New York taxpayers through high taxes and a lack of job opportunities. Our high taxes, particularly our high property taxes, have contributed to New York consistently being ranked near the bottom when compared to other states for business tax climate and total combined tax burden. By doing little to reform the structural reasons behind the high cost of living in New York, the state government has failed to make life better for families and businesses in every region.

To compound this problem, New York spends a high amount on public assistance programs that are meant to help citizens escape poverty and become self-sufficient, but include income thresholds that create what are known as "benefit cliffs". These benefit cliffs occur when an individual or family receiving public benefits hits a specified dollar amount in income and immediately loses eligibility to receive a certain public assistance benefit. When this happens, the state is creating a situation where New Yorkers would actually see a reduction in real take-home pay because the value of the public assistance benefit they will lose is worth more than the increased income they would receive through working. This means that low-income New Yorkers, through no fault of their own, will find it difficult to accept a job, more hours, or an increase in pay as the financial well-being of their family is threatened by working more. Work should be incentivized, and no New Yorker should ever be faced with a situation where working hard and earning a larger salary can actually lead to a decrease in real take-home pay.

These problems require state government officials to make hard choices, and make long-term structural changes in order to see real systemic changes to our economy in the long run. Therefore, the legislature finds it necessary to implement a ten-year state takeover of the local share of Medicaid outside of New York City, create the Commission to Reform Public Assistance Benefits to implement a new payment method to eradicate the benefit cliffs, expand the state earned income tax credit from thirty percent to forty-five percent of the federal credit amount, offer the option for individuals to receive the state earned income tax credit in monthly installments, expand the child and dependent care tax credit, assume the growth in property taxes for school districts and local governments that remain under the real property tax cap to take the burden off of homeowners, create a property tax redesign team that will produce recurring savings and subject New York City to the real property tax cap. These structural changes will help make New York more competitive, and a more attractive place to build a business and raise a family. They will also provide low-income New Yorkers with additional opportunities to better their situation and rise out of poverty.

§ 2. This act enacts into law major components of legislation providing for a ten-year state takeover of the local share of Medicaid outside of New York City, providing for a twenty-year state takeover of fifty percent of the local share of Medicaid in New York City, creating the Commission to Reform Public Assistance Benefits, expanding the state earned income tax credit from thirty percent to forty-five percent of the federal credit amount, offering the option for individuals to receive the state earned income tax credit in monthly installments, expanding the child and dependent care tax credit, assuming the growth in property taxes for school districts and local governments that remain under the real property tax cap to take the burden off of homeowners, creating a property tax redesign team required to produce recurring savings and subjecting New York City to the real property tax cap. Each component is wholly contained within a Part identified as Parts A through I. The effective date for each particular provision contained within such Part is set forth in the last section of such Part. Any provision in any section contained within a Part, including the effective date of the Part, which makes reference to a section "of this act", when used in connection with that particular component, shall be deemed to mean and refer to the corresponding section of the Part in which it is found. Section four of this act sets forth the general effective date of this act.
